

The Harbor Light

[Example] Author Name

Half title

She did not call it brave. She called it
Tuesday.

Epigraph · [Example]

NOVEL TEMPLATE

The Harbor Light

[Example] Author Name

A fictional novel set as a paperback template.

[Example]

Copyright

[Example] Fictional sample. This text is not a published novel. Replace it with the manuscript you have the right to print.

First template edition. All sample places are invented.

CONTENTS

Contents

Chapter 1 · The Missing Skiff	7
Chapter 2 · Market Hour	21
Chapter 3 · The Note	35
Chapter 4 · Tide Table	49

Market Hour

The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door.

The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there.

Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil.

A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door. The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there.

Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door.

The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there. Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice.

The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door. The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step.

The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there. Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket.

A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door. The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there.

Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door.

The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there. Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice.

The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door. The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step.

The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there. Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket.

The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door. The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday.

By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there. Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful.

She read the note at the table, then again at the door. The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there. Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short.

The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door. The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool.

Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there. Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill.

The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door. The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday.

By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there. Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful.

She read the note at the table, then again at the door. The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there. Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short.

The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door. The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool.

Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there. Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill.

She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door. The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it.

She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there. Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil.

A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door. The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there.

Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice. The market closed when the light left the hill. She bought bread, walked the long way, and kept the note in her pocket. The tide table was three lines and a smudge of pencil. A gull stood on the capstan and refused to be useful. She read the note at the table, then again at the door.

The lamp room smelled of oil and wet wool. Someone had swept the stair and left the broom on the third step. The harbor was a black bowl with one white nick in it. She did not call it brave. She called it Tuesday. By the last corner the bread was cold and the light was still there. Mara counted the boats twice and still came up one short. The missing skiff belonged to her uncle, who never tied it the same way twice.

